There's nothing quite like taking in the classics, whether it's a play by Shakespeare, an opera by Puccini or a ballet by Tchaikovsky. But let's face it, sometimes these productions can feel, well, a little too tried and true. In Washington, classical organizations are injecting a youthful vibe into their programming with fresh performances and even social events that draw the area's young (and young at heart).

The next time you head over to the Kennedy Center or Folger Theatre, look for off-stage gatherings, like meet-the-cast mixers and even happy hours and ice cream socials. Just turn to page 8 to find out how D.C.'s cultural landscape is "lit."

This month highlights other productions, too, like festivals and foodie events that take full advantage of the season. As we settle into November and fall (my favorite), let us help you plan your social calendar with our picks for top things to see and do this month, plus a roundup of some of our favorite spots for a spot of tea (page 32)—the perfect way to cap a gorgeous autumn day in the nation's capital.

Culture Is #Lit

From cast member mixers to craft beer get-togethers, D.C.'s classical institutions are finding new ways to woo the young (and the young at heart).

By Amy Alipio

REMEMBER WHEN the Google Art Selfie went viral and everyone was posting what masterpiece they resembled? (Mine was Gauguin's "Two Breton Girls by the Sea.") By reaching out in creative ways to younger audiences, Washington's classical arts organizations hope to generate that same kind of meme-worthy excitement around D.C.'s culture scene.

For example, the Kennedy Center has introduced new events focusing on comedy, hip-hop and contemporary music. Woolly Mammoth Theatre Company offers pre-show ice cream socials. And Shakespeare Theatre Company pairs happy-hour drinks at its Forum bar with performances by local musicians, dancers and puppeteers.

Even opera is mixing it up with millennials. Washington National Opera's young professionals group, BravO, plans a variety of events to introduce people under 40 to the original sopranos. A recent talk explored the relevance of the #MeToo movement to Puccini's "Tosca." At a party on board a Potomac cruise boat or a casual get-together at a Watergate bar, BravO members enjoy the chance to mingle with young opera artists.

"The artists might sing an aria actually in your face, as opposed to your sitting in a dark auditorium and they're wearing layers of makeup and wigs," says the former president of the BravO council, Coetzee Pretorius. "People who had been afraid of opera, who said it's too stuffy, see it can be fun, it can be contemporary."

One of Washington's oldest young professional groups is the Washington Ballet's Jeté Society, which holds popular "beerballet&bubbly" events with behind-the-scenes access to a ballet production rehearsal, followed by drinks and mingling.

Classical art forms are also breaking out of its classical spaces. NSO in Your Neighborhood, for example, brings free National Symphony Orchestra chamber performances to churches and night clubs. "We are trying to meet this audience where they are," says Courtney Burke, the Kennedy Center's director of marketing analytics and audience insights.

Even—or especially—if they're in the virtual world. "By investing more in digital marketing and our web and social media presence, we are able to reach new audiences through a diverse array of channels," Burke says.

Arts organizations also know it's not just the programming and venue that need to appeal, but the price. Most performing arts organizations, from the Shakespeare-focused Folger Theatre to historic Ford's Theatre, offer discounted tickets for patrons under 30, as well as pay-what-you-can nights and last-minute, day-of tickets.

Travelers to Washington can join D.C.'s young adult audiences this month at special events such as the Folger Theatre's "Brews and Banter" evening of craft beers and meet-the-cast opportunities at the November 1 performance of "King John"; National Symphony Orchestra's "Declassified: Ben Folds Presents" concert on November 2, with singer Regina Spektor and tap dancer Caleb Teicher; or Shakespeare Theatre Company's Happenings Happy Hour event on November 29, before that night's showing of "An Inspector Calls."

But with so many top-notch arts offerings throughout the capital, you don't really need a special event. Whether hula, step, or Logic is your thing, there's bound to be something to tempt you to a Washington, D.C., performance hall—no matter what your age.

MIXIN' IT UP

At Folger Theatre's "Brews and Banter" get-togethers, audiences sip craft beer, mingle with cast members and gain insights into current productions; (Opposite) The Kennedy Center's contemporary music program brings today's hitmakers, like Solange Knowles, to the historic stage.

Compass Coffee

Washington's caffeine fiends are benefiting from an influx of bean shops, with top purveyors like West Coast big leaguers Blue Bottle, Philz and more setting up shop all around the city. But long before these newbies came to town, D.C.'s own Compass Coffee gave the scene an early jolt with roasts that name-check the cafe's hometown (think Embassy, Shaw and 7th Street). Started by longtime pals and former Marines, Michael Haft and Harrison Suarez, Compass now counts eight outposts, including the original homestead in Shaw, meaning you're never too far from a great cuppa. Multiple locations, compasscoffee.com

Arlington National Cemetery

Union officers commandeered the Arlington, Virginia, property of Robert E. Lee for the earliest graves at what has become a 624-acre burial ground. Now the land holds the remains of 340,000 soldiers and civilians, most marked by a simple headstone. To be buried here the deceased must have served in the military or government. (Spouses and children also qualify.) Many times each day, the sounds of taps and rifle salutes signal the ongoing loss of old and young warriors, meanwhile an eternal flame keeps the memories of John F. Kennedy, his wife and family members alive. On the hill, Lee's former homestead overlooks the city beyond. 877.907.8585, arlingtoncemetery.org
